Excerpt from Treatise Upon a New Manner of Medical Practice, Called Homoeopathie, Elucidated by Comparing the High Station of Homoeopathie With the Usual Mode of Practice Called Allopathie If we take an active and lively interest in questions of politics and possession, we ought particularly to favour a science, and view it with the torch of unprejudiced truth, when experience has fully sustained it, and furnished the conclusive evidence that life and health is by it secured. I suppose it is a peculiar tendency in the character of our present generation, to search and scrutinize into the motives of every thing, and again level it with the maxims of our actions. As my existence needs no apology, because the law of creation gave me life, so do I think it superfluous to excuse myself if I elevate my voice after my best conscience and knowledge, showing the past and the present errors as it concerns especially the life and health of my fellow creatures. What man of reason and truth must not desire that various opinions and manifold reasonings may meet...
